I really enjoyed reading 'The Hobbit' because it drops you right into a whole different world that is completely different from ours but yet so similar. It grabs you right from the title and takes you into the perspective of a little creature that we know nothing about. The author did a really good job of introducing all the characters in a way where it left the reader unaware that they were being introduced to the characters because it was done in such an interesting way. We then experience the journey of the Hobbit and all of the other characters as they journey through a land of our dreams. Wizards, goblins, trolls and orcs; this book had it all, and every single character plays a part in the story. When the story really got going was when they when they went to Riverndale, a town of elves. The reader uncovers some important details about the characters and the land that they were in. The story is a really important part of the book because it shapes the characters and gives them a depth that other books wouldn't have. The story of each character also shapes the whole book. The dwarves each have a reason to get back their land no matter what, and they each have their own perspective of everything that happens in the book. My favourite part was the battle of the five armies. All of the armies fight for the place that the Hobbit and the Dwarves were trying to get to. This part of the story has some twists and turns the whole way through and has a great ending.
